Big Picture on Topic Modeling:

- Understand topic breakdown for ad targeting.
- Monitor changes in topic breakdown over time.
- Recommendation system for users
 - ...especially if integrated with forum search.
 - Potentially a completely different way to navigate the site compared to the traditional reverse chronological discussion forum layout.

Note how much technical language there is here. Lots of opportunity to differentiate topics.

Hi all,

As some of you know my rig is an 89 YJ, sitting on 8.5" lift and 35" patagonia tires. My steering components are getting worn out and I'm starting to look at options for replacing them. I don't get any death wobble and it is surprisingly steerable even without a high steer kit. Currently I have a heavy duty steering box with a drop pitman arm, I believe the stock drag link and tie rod, and a rough country steering stabilizer.

I noticed on the trail last weekend that even with keeping my steering wheel straight, my wheels would turn slightly back and forth over rocks (maybe 1.5" of play or so). Ball joints are fine.

I can grab my tie rod and twist it without much effort, and the steering makes a lot of creaks and clunks when turning in parking lots and such and the boots are torn. The steering wheel is also hit or miss on if it's centered or not.

Power steering works great, although I have a new reservoir on order since one of the mounting bolts was too long and ended up cracking the plastic by coming into contact with it... Still works, fluid level just remains low.

What options are out there for upgrading my steering? I know a few companies make heavy duty tie rod and drag links. Or is it better to just stick with MOOG components and stay fairly stock? just replace my tie rod ends? I'm open to any suggestions people have (besides full hydro 😊). The jeep is my DD if that makes any difference for options.

I appreciate any advice!

Have you considered using WJ knuckles and building your own drag link and tie rod using one ton rod ends? Also allows you to upgrade to dual piston akebono calipers that will greatly improve braking. Swap out a relatively simple and a good value considering the simultaneous brake and steering upgrade.
